In this talk I discuss how concepts and computational methods taken from the quantitative finance field can be very useful in developing optimal controls for real energy assets. I begin by reviewing some stochastic models for natural gas market prices. I then discuss the problem of using Real Options theory to value and control a natural gas storage facility. I conclude with an outlook for applying similar techniques to problems arising in the oil market.